DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS

This dignified residence, built between 1917 and 1919 and designed by F. Burrall Hoffman, Jr., combines a modified neo-Georgian style with an arcaded loggia in the continental tradition.

The area in which the house is located acquired the name "Carnegie Hill" soon after Andrew Carnegie erected his mansion at Fifth Avenue and 91st Street at the turn of the century. Although middle-class residences had been built in the area in the 1880s and 1890s, Carnegie's move inspired other well-to-do business and professional people to also build here. The property was purchased in 1916 by Charlotte Winthrop Fowler, wife of Robert Fowler, Jr., in 1916 under the terms of a restrictive fifteen-year covenant, which stipulated that any building erected could not be used for any other purpose than a private dwelling. Mrs. Fowler then commissioned the house, but she sold it in August 1919 to Harriet S. Clark.

The imposing four-story house displays a monumentality that belies its scale. A rusticated arcaded loggia at street level, with rusticated entrance wall set back about six feet from the arches, provides a substantial base for the house. The keystones of the arches are embellished by decorative human masks, one male and one female. Especially handsome carved and paneled double doors accent the entranceway. A modillioned stone cornice, surmounted by a graceful wrought-iron balcony rail, separates the first floor from the English bond brick facade above. The French windows of the upper three stories are crowned by Georgian-style, flat keyed stone arches; those above the high parlor floor windows are accent by swagged keystones. A low parapet pierced by two balustrades crowns the facade, concealing a setback attic story.

The unique arcaded loggia and the fine neo-Georgian details of the house are combined to create a residence which is an interesting example of the architecture in Carnegie Hill in the early 20th century. Its imposing and dignified appearance adds an important element to the block, and it enhances the entire Carnegie Hill area.
